The patented device is a small, self-contained, two-compartment, portable apparatus for treatment of injuries from electric arc burns or other sources of painful electric shock, such as immersion in water or other media. It allows for the treatment of an individual using a variety of existing devices, such as a needle-type analgesic, a wire-like electrode or one of the bandages often used to cover the burn and administer other treatments, such as topical medications. The device can be used to apply a burning, energized electrode to the surface of the burn, using a small amount of anesthetic or anesthetizing gel. The burning of the area relieves pain, stimulates the body to heal faster, and reduces swelling of the area by ablating (burning off) the outer layer of skin. This also allows for a wider area of treatment than would be possible with the use of larger area treatment devices.
